Re: Docket #97P-0329 ✓

I urge the FDA to require manufacturers to display caffeine content prominently on the labels of foods that contain significant amounts of caffeine. Consumers have the right to know caffeine content of foods and beverages.

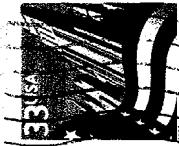

Also, studies should be conducted to study caffeine's effect on health & behavior. Determine if other regulatory or educational efforts should be undertaken.

Caffeine poses a health risk to millions of Americans, especially women who are or might become pregnant. As caffeinated products become more prevalent, and the marketing of those products to children increases, consumers need more information to take charge of their own and their family's health. Caffeinated products should be limited to children whose growth it might impair.
